Overtime Rule Timing Update

By Emilee Hille

At the November 5, 2015 American Bar Association meeting, Patricia Smith, Solicitor of Labor, stated that the Department of Labor (DOL) will not release exemption status and overtime rule changes until mid to late 2016. The DOL’s most-recent semi-annual regulatory agenda shows a July 2016 "Final Rule" timeframe for the revised regulations defining the federal Fair Labor Standards Act's Section 13(a)(1) exemptions. Among other changes outlined in a previous EHRA article, in the proposed revisions to the overtime rules, the threshold salary for employees to qualify as exempt would increase from the current rate of $455 to $970 per week.

While July 2016 is the current timeframe outlined, this is not a definitive date. If, however, the ‘Final Rule’ is published on July 1, 2016, it is expected that the earliest effective date would August 30, 2016, which is 60 days after the ruling. Timeframes for the implementation window generally range from 30-120 days between the final rule publication date and when the changes will go into effect. “Another possibility, however, is a phased-in effective date, which is rumored to be gaining favor on Capitol Hill.” The upcoming presidential election will also play into how and when the final rules will be rolled out.

During this period, it is important for Human Resources Departments to work with their management and legal representatives to analyze current positions that could be effected by these new rules and to plan how to quickly implement when the final effective date is set.

Supreme Court to Rule on Contraceptive Coverage for Religious Groups

Provided by Ben Schmitt, Old National Insurance

On Nov. 6, 2015, the Supreme Court agreed to review the ACA’s requirement that health plans provide contraceptive coverage to their employees and students without cost-sharing and how it applies to nonprofit religious organizations. Seven nonprofit organizations will challenge the rule, making it the second time in three years that the issue has come before the court.

Although the current law states that nonprofits and private companies can opt out of the requirement, religious nonprofits say that simply writing a letter or completing a form makes them morally complicit in providing the coverage. The new challenge asks the Supreme Court to allow nonprofit groups to receive the same blanket exclusion as houses of worship and religious organizations.

Whatever the Supreme Court decides, it’s not likely to end the dispute. A ruling for nonprofits could prompt for-profit corporations to seek the same relief.

The December Dilemma

Workplace Diversity During the Holidays
By Danyelle Granger

December can be one of the most complex times of the year for people in the workplace, as well as the general community, because of the variety of religious and cultural holidays observed and the desire to remain politically correct and not offend others. However, it can also be one of the most opportune times to develop our cultural competency.

Many of our coworkers, neighbors and community members will celebrate various holidays this season, while some may not celebrate at all. So is it most appropriate to just say “Happy Holidays” or “Season’s Greetings” to everyone we come in contact with? Or can we use it as a learning opportunity to find out more about those who celebrate differently from ourselves?

I’d say the latter!

In The December Dilemma, an article published by the Tanenbaum Center, it states, “Be curious and ask respectful questions. The holidays are an excellent time to raise awareness around religious diversity in your office, so don’t be afraid to ask respectful questions of your coworkers. For instance, it is appropriate to ask a coworker what holiday greeting they prefer or if they have any holiday practices to be aware of, as long as the questions are respectful and come from a place of genuine curiosity. Asking your colleague a question is one of the best ways to avoid misunderstandings and make sure that everyone feels included and respected during the holiday season.”

Tanenbaum also suggests going the extra step of learning new phrases to ensure the use of appropriate greetings for coworkers and clients, which sends an important message that they are valued. Below are some examples of appropriate greetings they suggest.

- “Eid Mubarak,” the Arabic greeting meaning “blessed Eid.”
- “Happy Diwali” or the Hindi greeting “Saal Mubarak,” which means “Happy New Year.”
- “Happy Hanukkah”
- “Merry Christmas”
- “Habari Gani?” which is “What’s the news?” in Swahili, the language used for Kwanzaa greetings. The response will be the name of that day—“Nia” for example.
- Numerous greetings are used during the Chinese New Year.

If you aren’t sure what holiday, if any, your coworker or client celebrates, you can use a more general greeting such as “Happy Holidays” or “Have a good year end.”

While we may not all celebrate the same holidays or even understand all of the traditions associated with cultures outside of our own, we must recognize that this time of year holds a different meaning for each of us. Keeping our cultural differences in mind is crucial to fostering an inclusive and respectful workplace all year round.
